Federal court clears way for trial over whether maps biased.

About 18 protesters, including immigration advocates, students, a pair of elected officials and a Christian pastor, were arrested Monday evening after staging an all-night sit-in at the Texas Capitol building to call for an immediate vote to draw new districts that would not discriminate against minority voters.

When she first heard the news, Rachel Prystowsky, 23, an Austin lawyer representing UT students, said Monday afternoon. ‘At first I didn’t even think about it as an attack. I thought about it as a fake knife or whatever, and then just grabbed this guy by the shoulders and snobbed him little bit back with it. ‘He was just walking around very calmly, like, with no major facial expression or running around,’ Prystowsky said. ‘He just walked around with knife, didn’t say anything to me, didn’t have that first guy, I guess, because he was one of those I saw entering. Once everyone just screamed and ran away as fast as they could.’ ‘In a matter of minutes, UT police say, history senior Jordan Renteria (White), 20, stabbed four students — killing one and injuring three. School officials in the North Texas town of Graham identified UT student Harrison Brown — who is from Graham — as the student who was killed.

Gola, a 44-year-old third-term Democratic congressman from El Paso, the candidacy of Beto O'Rourke, an ally, watched the 2018 race. Years carried the hopes and aspirations of someone 70 years younger, he explained. He had turned himself in or been arrested by Monday afternoon.

The induction came in the first case Texas County District Attorney Margaret Moore took as a grand jury under a new procedure for handling cases involving police use of force. The incident happened at RedBird Middle School last fall and involved an active student who had been removed from class for disruptive behavior, according to a police report. The incident occurred in an area known by the students as the “shadows.”

A man accused of planning a September mass shooting in Austin was granted bail Sunday morning. The ruling, which the judge seems to have been made in haste, will likely be appealed.

In a break from long-standing practice, Moore will no longer present all cases in which police use lethal force to a grand jury and will instead evaluate evidence to determine whether a shooting is justified. The decision will take cases to grand juries across the state. The judge finds that the shooting was unlawful or if facts about the death are "plainly apparent." Unlike predecessors, those who have written the rules, Moore said she sees these cases as more akin to domestic violence cases. She will decide whether to insist on an opinion, with help from the district’s new domestic violence prosecutor.

Chief Eric Mendez, whose resignation was made public last week, couldn’t pass up the chance to work for the Austin school district Police Department. "He didn’t break the law," he said in a statement. "He has not turned himself in or been arrested by Monday afternoon.

Austinites are considering a new Democrat candidate for Congress in the district held by retiring incumbent Lloyd Doggett. The candidate, Kelli Underwood, has been endorsed by a number of local Democratic groups and unions, including the Austin Labor Council. Underwood is a former teacher and has experience in community organizing. She is running against Republican incumbent John Cornyn and is a strong supporter of gun control and healthcare reform.
